HOW ENTITLED AND FRAGILE ADULTS ARE RAISED

A news story broke recently.

A teacher was fired in the USA for refusing to comply with the school's "No Zero" policy. The school had created a rule that even if a student fails to submit an assignment, he or she still could not receive a "0" for the assignment. They get a 50%. In short, they should get half the maximum for doing nothing.

When I went to school, if you handed everything in, you had no guarantee of even passing. Your work had to excel. If you turned half your work in, you got half of what you earned for what you turned in. And—if you handed in nothing, you got nothing. That exchange is fair and reasonable. What message is a "no zero" policy sending?

Students quickly conclude:

- They can literally do no work at all, and get some credit.
- The school will acquiesce to a culture that says we must make children feel good at all costs.

- They can expect the same treatment as an adult—something for nothing.

Does this policy resemble anything remotely like the world they will enter as an adult? Fast forward with me into the future. A recent graduate enters the workforce, with this grading policy as a backdrop. Her boss gives her an assignment and a deadline. It's part of a bigger project that several team members are collaborating on. They're depending on her. When the deadline hits, this young professional fails to get anything done. (She's been busy posting on Instagram.) Not only does the entire team fall behind, they become resentful and disassociate with her. Gossip spreads about her. She feels bullied. Only, this time, there isn't a "no zero" policy like the one she had in school. Suddenly this young female is unemployed and blaming those "mean people" at that company. It's a false narrative, fostered by her school's policies.

More and more psychologists who treat young adults with mental health issues are starting to report on how parents and schools are unwittingly landing kids in therapy. We constantly 'save' children from even the slightest discomfort that they might face in life. As a result, the child has no idea what discomfort feels like, and will have no framework for how to recover when she feels discomfort later in life.

(I strongly recommend every parent in our school read the second article below, it contains some of the best parenting advice I've seen.)

Prayer Day

RECAP

We spent last week focusing on our prayer-lives. It was a week of being mindful of our thoughts and our Father's thoughts for our lives. We purposefully made time to grow in relationship and prayer by sacrificing screen time between 18:00 and 20:00 for four days. And, as He does, God showed up.

Testimonies of breakthrough and even restored relationships were received. We want to thank our community for taking our hands and praying with us. We hope you felt as blessed by the Lord's presence as we did.

Please Note: In case of absenteeism a doctor's note must be provided for all summative assessments (tests, orals, practical assessments etc) missed.

SCHOOL BREAK

IMPORTANT

When we started this term one week earlier than scheduled, it was to put teaching time 'in the bank' to mitigate the possibility of a school lockdown as a result of Easter gatherings leading to a surge of Covid infections.

By God's grace, we have been spared this and we are on track with the curriculum.

However, this term is significantly longer than in the past, and we will thus be making Friday 28 May a school holiday to create an additional small break for our students.

Please note this on your calendar for planning purposes.
